

Gargoyles: a 3 act play with songs & a chorus for live performance or video streaming

Have you ever wondered why Town Halls in many cultures have tearooms in the cellar? Underground cafes which are mostly frequented by Senior Citizens or OAPs (Old Age Pensioners). I saw the subculture parallel here and my imagination took off about how a minority segment of the broader community finds solace, connects to their peers and reminisces in the Twilight Years. A quarter of a century later and GARGOYLES takes on unexpected relevance as this curious minority population of the elderly that fascinated me then, has now become a majority. The ageing citizens of any town hall may still congregate in these basement meeting places, yet they have become more confident and affluent as a recognisable and consumer-driven demographic. The once easy to ignore old people in most of our societies are more powerful than ever before in history. The next generation is missing out on many of the opportunities of the aspiring middle class of the postwar decades, whilst the ageing population can muse and recollect at leisure in the 21st century. The old women characters portrayed in GARGOYLES would be in their late 90s today. Yet the history they describe and personal past is vibrantly recalled in the Town Hall cafes mysterious Cloak Room where the actors disappear and reemerge as the young, hopeful women they once were... Written in the early 1990s in Brisbane, Australia, I edited this play in 1999 in my hometown of 20 odd years, Berlin, for performance in English or German.
